EXTRACTS.

ESTABLISHMENT.

The path that we to you that led,
Untroubled long, with grass green grown,
Made carpet that his legs spread
Dance the Prince of Pleasure
When he was visiting the dead.
And who are they but the dead?
Ere my coming could arrive
Ere my kind of me you
Warned each other and other eyes,
See the path blurred without eyes.
But when I traced its winding way
With added steps, at every step
Think back the memory in my feet,
Each grass-blade that was forgotten,
Where my foot had been your foot.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, in Century.

QUICKSILVER IN THE TRANSVAAL.

We take the following from a letter written by the Transvaal correspondent of the Argus—Some Boers travelling in the bush with a view to rest their cattle, and of course made a fire, using stones to prop the pot and kettle up. As there are lots of dry wood they used it unsparingly, with the result that they saw what they called "running silver." These good people have lighted upon a grand discovery, which will be of immense advantage to gold-mining, for what the Boers have discovered is a lump of diamond, and the running silver which they could not understand was quicksilver.

QUEER STORIES.

LINDA'S LEGACY.
It was one of those strong affections which sometimes exist between the old and the young, and which seem to elude the theory of natural inheritance. For old Mr. Walters was much more like Linda's father—her grandfather, for the matter of that—than she was her own legitimate progenitor, and the love between the two would have afforded a capital theme for a discourse on the power of elective affinity. Both were artists; old Mr. Walters being a master in the craft whereof Linda was but a humble beginner; and part of the tie between them was the old man's desire to see his favorite professional work, which he had been so long in the habit of giving her on the management of her colors and the laws of perspective. It was thus a double bond—master and pupil, father and daughter; and on either side it was equally strong.

"I will always be your friend, little Linda," Mr. Walters used to say. "When I die you shall find I have not forgotten you. I have not much to leave, but you shall come in for your share with the rest."
But whenever he spoke like this, Linda would begin to cry, and protest that she wanted nothing with his property, and did not care to be remembered in his will. "Only say," she used to say, "that I have been a good and obedient daughter to you, and that I never made you angry."

For Mr. Walters was a peppy-tempered old gentleman, and had the knack of quarrelling with his best friends for a word or a look. He was the Boanerges of his society, and his thunder was formidable. But Linda had somehow learnt the secret of keeping peace with him; and never since their first acquaintance had there been a cross word between them.

Things went on comfortably enough for some years, when, one summer—Linda being away nursing a sick sister—it is to be supposed the heat mounted to the old man's brain, for he broke out like a volcano against a certain Mrs. Lee, and the usual humors and embittered and old man put himself so much in the wrong by his passion and violence, that he was forced to leave Fairfield and go over to Tours, where his family and certain of his friends lived. "For he had a wife and children all this time; only for sundry reasons which may well be imagined and need not be particularized, he and they found it more agreeable to leave the place than to live under one roof. Now, however, when his own home had tumbled about his ears, he was forced to find shelter with them. And as it came to pass that Linda being still held by her duty to her sick sister, these two dear friends never met again, and only letters of when took the place of the daughter's presence, and the fatherly protection which had been the rule of life between them.

At Tours lived a certain obscure, but ambitious, and, for the matter of that, eccentric, painter called Maze. This worthy had ideas, truly, but he expressed them in such hideous colors and with such extraordinary contortions of line and color, that very few could understand what his pictures meant when they were done. He called them one thing, but they might as well have been another—anything, in fact, you like to say—without much loss to sense or probability. They did not sell; but Maze always asserted that one day they would, and that even now other men borrowed from them. Walters was what the world called a friend. In spite of the old man's temper, he had the power of attaching people to his service, while all painters of note or aspiration clustered round him like devils round a strine. His talk was full of valuable information on his art, and his professional criticisms were of so much account, that to be able to say to Walters told me to do this—"Walters praised that"—was of itself as good as a diploma of merit. And Maze was a man who, of all things, knew his best mental feeding-grounds, and how to spread his own way in the sunshine of another's intellect.

Among the few things of value which Mr. Walters had left, there were certain small bits of plate which he had picked up at curiosity-shops and the like. He was fond of goldsmiths' work, and he prized them more than it deserved. To hear him, he had as many cups and vases by Cellini as all the rest of the world taken together; and he even insisted on "Michael Angelo's," when the work was specially coarse—he called it broad—and asserted, without fear of contradiction, that he could see the great master's touch here on this silver flagon as well as on the "Moses" or the "Pieta." All the same, the collection was a valuable one; and who was to have the reversion was a matter of anxious speculation among the friends. "To none was it anxious to Mr. Walters, the obscure, ambitious, eccentric, and impudently glib painter at Tours.

When the time came for the old man to go over to the majority, and while he had still strength enough to arrange his affairs according to his will, he called Maze to him and said, "Maze, you are my only friend, my only confidant, my only true friend. I am an infirm old man, and I am anxious to believe that you are sincere."

"Make the half whole, Mr. Walters, and then you will square the circle," said Maze, who always was so odd in his speech as to be in his painting.
"Well, I will, I am going to trust you," said Mr. Walters. "Bring me that box, there in the corner, and take out what you find in it. One, two, three, four," he added, as Maze took out one by one those bits of rare old plate which the Master had picked up with so much enthusiasm, cherished with so much care, and the reversion of which was a matter of so much anxious thought to so many friends. "Now pack these carefully, and address the box to my little daughter Linda. The others I give to Dashe and Steg." "You air," said Maze, glibly as to tongue, heavily as to heart; for nothing was assigned to him—not a cup, not a vase—and he had spent his time, and some of his blood over fat suppers, in carrying the old gentleman, hoping for a substantial remuneration when all was over. And when he did not know, and of whose friendship with the Master he was, as well as some other, mortally jealous.

"Dear little Linda!" said Mr. Walters, faintly; "she was always a good and dutiful daughter to me; she never angered me, never crossed me, and I want her to have something by her, to remember her old father to the end of her life. Are those cups well packed, Maze?"
"Yes, sir; perfectly!"
"No chance of being bruised or battered or shaken out of my way?"—no chance of those thieves of the Custom House putting their roving fingers into the pack and pulling away any of the silver?"
"No, I have done them up as carefully as if they were for myself," said Maze.
"That is right, Maze. You will see to it all for my little girl—see that she gets them safe and sound, and in the state in which they are now?"
"I will see to it, Mr. Walters; you may rely on me," said Maze.
"It will be wrong for you if you do not do your duty," said the old man. "Mark my words, Maze—worse for you."
"Yes, sir," said Maze, submissively; and with that the old Master turned his face to the wall and died. The last act of his life had been to bequeath that box of rare old plate to his favorite pupil and adopted daughter, Linda.

When all was over, and the brave old man was buried beneath the shadow of the yew-tree, in the churchyard at Tours, Maze, wrote a letter to Linda, in which he told her of her old father's bequest; but he added this paragraph, which somewhat spoiled the rest—
"I have done my duty, and fulfilled my promise to my old friend in informing you of this legacy; but now I put it to you to say whether or not you will accept it. Honorably and rightfully it belongs to certain members of his family, who have incurred much expense, without remuneration, during this last illness of their relation, and who, I am sure, are fully entitled to all that he has left. About this there can be no two opinions with honorable people. As I think you are one of those people, and I therefore so things in the light in which I have put them, I will hold the box over until I receive your instructions as to its destination—that is, whether you will profit by the last moments of a weak man, and accept such a legacy, or restore to the family what should never have been parted from them?"
Linda was not slow in deciding. One of those sensitive people who pride themselves on the purity of their love, she would always rather give than receive. And, indeed, to receive benefits from those whom she loved was always a matter of some pain to her. She turned to hear the sneers of those who laughed at the clever way in which she had feathered her nest—the masterly manner in which she had got round the old man, so that he should leave her this splendid legacy; and she seemed to bear the reproaches of those who were not so easily deceived, and who, red eyes and averted faces, expected to receive whatever there might be to leave. It would be dishonourable to accept this bequest, it would be mean and selfish and unworthy. Mr. Maze was quite right. It was her duty to renounce it. Whereupon she wrote an impulsive letter, full of high feeling and the usual humors and embittered and old man put himself so much in the wrong by his passion and violence, that he was forced to leave Fairfield and go over to Tours, where his family and certain of his friends lived. "For he had a wife and children all this time; only for sundry reasons which may well be imagined and need not be particularized, he and they found it more agreeable to leave the place than to live under one roof.
